THE FORTY SHILLING FREEHOLDER

Irish Independent

Wednesday
24/2/1960

A FREEHOLDER may be described as a farmer who holds land for ever in contradistinction to a farmer who holds by lease for a term of years. Despite the word "free" the freeholder was almost invariably required to pay a rent or render service to an overlord.

In former times only certain people had the right to vote at parliamentary elections. In the reign of Henry VI (1422-1461) the English Parliament enacted that the right to vote at parliamentary elections should be given to all male freeholders over 21 years of age whose freehold was of forty shilling annual value.

It was felt in the fifteenth century that a farm capable of yielding an income of forty shillings a year to an industrious farmer would provide all the necessities of life and render such a freeholder independent. Owing to the alteration in the value of money a freeholder of the eighteenth century who was unable to make more than forty shillings annual profit lived in misery. He was invariably in arrears with his rent.

Public Voting

IN those days voting was done in public. By the 18th century the voter was required to take a number of oaths, identifying himself, declaring he held a forty shilling freehold, that he owed no arrears of rent or charges save taxes and cess (now called rates). He was also required to abjure bribery and corruption.

The great English jurist, Lord Justice Blackstone, writing in the second half of the eighteenth century said that it might not be amiss if candidates also were bound to take the last-named oath. By that time bribery and intimidation at elections were routine.

The landlord or his representative attended the election and if a voter refrained from voting for the candidate his landlord favoured that voter would rue the day. So many voters, especially forty shilling freeholders, owed arrears of rent that it was simple to evict them.

To The Market

THE Irish forty shilling freeholder was given the right to vote by an Act passed by the Irish parliament in 1542, in the reign of Henry VIII. That freeholder became a subject of much discussion towards the end of the eighteenth century when the struggle for Catholic emancipation was entering its final stages.

Wolfe Tone, in his pamphlet on behalf of the Catholics of Ireland published in Belfast in 1791, refers to the "wretched tribe of forty shilling freeholders whom we see driven to their octennial market (parliaments were then elected every eight years) by their landlords as much their property as the sheep or the bullocks which they brand with their names." The freeholders to whom Tone was referring must have been Protestant for at that time Catholics had not the right to vote.

It was feared by the opponents of Catholic emancipation that if Catholics were given the right to vote they would have a majority in the Irish parliament. Tone dealt with this objection by urging that the vote be extended to such Catholics only as had a freehold of £10 annual value.

O'Connell's View

IN 1825 a parliamentary commission sat in London to inquire into the state of Ireland. O'Connell gave evidence and said that he doubted whether raising the qualification of voters would be desirable. As an individual he desired to extend the franchise to everyone, but "it is quite another question whether, so much liberty being purchased by emancipation, it would be right for the Catholics to take a stand upon the forty shilling freeholders. The system is full of abuses and with the extreme number of oaths with which it is loaded creates great perjury. Generally speaking, forty shilling freeholders exercise no freedom of election. They become part of the livestock of a great estate."

O'Connell was correct when he referred to perjury. Thirty pounds was often paid for a vote at this time. Further, landlords tended to remit all or part of the arrears of rent at election time to "court" the freeholders. After the passing of the Act of 1793, which allowed Catholics to vote, the number of forty shilling freeholders increased as landlords created small freeholds to increase the number of votes on their estate.

In the various negotiations which took place upon Catholic emancipation O'Connell agreed to the disfranchisement of the forty shilling freeholders if given emancipation. In 1828 he stood as candidate at a bye-election in Clare, the first Catholic to stand for parliament since the enactment of the penal laws. During the campaign Francis Gore, a local landlord, charged him with having betrayed the forty-shilling freeholders. O'Connell replied that he had consented to the disfranchisement in order to conciliate and because he thought that the forty shilling freeholders consisted of nothing more than the property of their landlords.

"Are they like the negroes, to be lashed by their torturer to the slave mart and sold to the highest bidder?" asked O'Connell. "I want to know will Mr. Gore who brings forward the accusation, punish them if they dare to act otherwise than as if they were slaves."

After Emancipation

WITH the aid of the forty shilling freeholders of Clare, O'Connell won this election and Catholic emancipation was passed on April 13th, 1829. The forty shilling freeholders were deprived of the vote by an Act which comes immediately after the Emancipation Act in the statute book. To put it at its lowest, the forty shilling freeholder lost the chance of a bribe at election time, and to use O'Connell's words, the benefits that might come to him when the landlord "courted" him. However, the people were satisfied with O'Connell's policy on the freehold question.

The forty shilling freeholder was on the way out in any event, for mass eviction, and the consolidation of small holdings—a feature of pre-famine Ireland—must have led to his disappearance.
